should control the production, distribution and marketing of man's primary foodstuff—wheat—and those who believe that such State Control, if continued, will destroy Free Enterprise, will smother Initiative and Progress, will curtail Liberty and Freedom—and so will lead to Socialism, the first step towards

The history of western Canada is recorded in its publications, and the image of the West, both its self-image and the stereotyped images that persist elsewhere, are framed by and reflected in those publications. The traditional image of western Canadians as rural, agrarian, proudly independent, and rather conservative, is abundantly reflected in the region's predominant early literary genres: accounts of exploration, travel, and settlement; immigration literature promoting visions of independent farmers and ranchers; settlers' accounts and memoirs; small-town histories bursting with pride in local communities and their achievements; and imaginative literature depicting western settlers overcoming and taming nature. Clearly, the history and the image of the Canadian West is reflected in its printed documents. Those who undertake to study or write that history will always be greatly beholden and dependent upon the work of the bibliographer, and Bruce Peel has been the bibliographer most closely associated with the Canadian Prairies.

references the entry numbers to those of the second edition. As well, the annotations, biographical notes, author, title, and subject indexes have been revised and expanded.

As F. Hedley Auld said in his foreword to the original 1956 edition, Peel's Bibliography "pictures kaleidoscopically the occupation and development of a region of great agricultural importance which became in the course of a few decades the new home of a multitude, many of whom had previously been landless people. Ingles and Distad's new edition will prove even more invaluable to students and academics interested in the history of the Prairie provinces, Prairie writers, or even the pattern of migration within Canada itself.

ERNEST B. INGLES is Associate Vice-President (Learning Services) and Chief Librarian at the University of Alberta and editor of the Bibliography of Canadian Bibliographies.

N. MERRELL DISTAD is Associate Director of Libraries (Bibliographic Services) at the University of Alberta.
